THE UNWANTED GUEST

J. Evil Scientist was busy working in his laboratory one day when Goonda burst in, her face the color of a pink rose.

"What's wrong, dear?" asked J. Evil. "You look positively healthy!"

"Bad news!" groaned Goonda. "This letter from Aunt Hagatha just came by Scare Mail! She's coming to visit us again!"

"That is bad news!" said J. Evil. "Every time she visits she disrupts everything in the castle . . . meddling with all of my unscientific experiments . . ."

"And with my cooking!" added Goonda. "My kitchen will never be the same!"

"No doubt about it," said J. Evil. "She's a meddlesome old grouch!"

"Somebody mention my name?" screeched a voice just outside, and in through a window flew Aunt Hagatha, astride a broom. She was ugly even for a witch.

"Oh, heh heh!" stammered J. Evil. "Aunt Hagatha! We were just talking about you!"

"Nothing good, I hope!" snarled Hagatha. She went over to J. Evil's laboratory table. "What're you doing here, nephew?"

"Oh, I'm just mixing up a little potion to change cute little bunnies into ugly old toads!" explained J. Evil.

"Good, I mean, bad idea!" cackled Hagatha. "But you shouldn't use powdered turtle furl. Why don't you try some condensed leprechaun tears instead?"

With that she poured a few drops into a pot on the table. BOOM! The laboratory shook with a violent explosion! When the dust settled, J. Evil, Goonda and Hagatha picked themselves up out of the rubble.

"You and your cheap ingredients!" snorted Hagatha. "I can see I can't do you any good around here!"

Suddenly she sniffed. "Smells like you're cooking something, Goonda! I've got some perfectly horrendous new recipes I'd like to try out!" she grinned.

In desperation Goonda quickly changed the subject. "Er, would you like to stay in the same room you stayed in before, Aunt Hagatha?" she asked.

Hagatha brightened. "You mean that clammy one with no ventilation, with cobwebs all over, and the sign Home Sour Home on the wall? I love that room!"

Then J. Evil had an inspiration. "Goonda, I have a fine idea!" he said. "Why not take dear Aunt Hagatha on a frightseeing tour of our town? You can visit the graveyard, and we have one of the finest city dumps in the country! Meanwhile, I'll prepare her room!"

"Wonderful!" cried Goonda. "Come, Aunt Hagatha, we'll use my broom to ride on!"

They took off, and J. Evil hurried up to Hagatha's room. The first thing he did was throw open the windows to air it out. Then he swept up all the cobwebs, scrubbed the floor, and as a final touch placed a bouquet of fresh flowers on the table.

When Goonda and Hagatha returned, Hagatha was a bit weary, so she went up to her room for a nap. But in a moment she came screaming down the stairs.

"What are you trying to do to me?" she yelled at J. Evil. "I can't stay in that room! It's horrible! Fresh air! Clean floor! Flowers! Ugh!"

"But we're fixing up all the rooms in the castle like that!" said J. Evil sweetly.

"I've never been so insulted in my life!" snapped Hagatha. "See if I ever visit you again!" With that she climbed on her broom and zoomed out the window.

"Oh, darling!" gushed Goonda. "You were wonderful! Simply wonderful!"

"Hold it!" said J. Evil. "Let's not get mushy, dear."

"You know," continued Goonda dreamily, "I sometimes wonder why I married you, and now I know . . . it's because you're so MEAN!"
